Today's Readings

Isaiah 25.1-9; Philippians 4.1-9; Matthew 22.1-14

Today's readings warn us not make light of the invitation to God's banquet.

The passage from Isaiah promises a banquet for all people on Mount Zion/Jerusalem, at which God will 'swallow up death' and remove all traces of sorrow. This was later associated with the Messiah, and is a metaphor for salvation in the end times, known as 'the day of the Lord'.

The fine rhetoric of Philippians spells out what it is to imitate Paul and to share the mind of Christ, as the whole passage centres on the idea of shared life, and of unity in the community.

Matthew 22 is a double parable. The passage tells us something about the kingdom of heaven, so the king is God. The king has invited members of his own class, the aristocracy, to the marriage feast of his son. Slaves are sent to escort those already invited, as animals have been butchered and cooked and the food is ready. But now they laugh off the invitation and refuse to come.

Yet the meal is to go ahead, so more slaves are sent to bring 'everyone you find' and when common people demur because they think themselves unworthy, they are to be pulled in. So the hall is filled with guests 'good and bad' (v.10). But who is the man inappropriately dressed? The 'wedding garment' means clean clothes, but is it to be understood literally or metaphorically? The man's fate suggests that he has somehow deliberately insulted the king.

All are called, but not all respond, and, in the context of this parable, this is the result of a knowing rejection of the one who calls, namely God. As in Matthew's earlier parables, it is not social or religious status that gets you in.
